

Organized Timer

User Stories

As a student, I would like to save the timers I often need so that I don't have to enter them in my phone every time I go to do one of my daily tasks, this will even further reduce the time I waste and would help me dedicate more time towards my studies and the impact on my concentration levels would be minimal.

As someone who has suffered from brain injury, I struggle with learning new things and remembering durations of certain tasks, the most notable one being cooking. I find myself cooking the same thing every day. My key worker attempts to teach me new ones to practice when I'm by myself, but I struggle to remember the steps and the times. If my keyworker could show me how to make a recipe and save the various steps on an application which would automatically start the timers for each step, I could be able to have a more varied diet.

As a kitesurfing instructor, my job is extremely sensitive as the sport could be dangerous if practiced in an erroneous way and I must make sure all the basic safety features of the kite are explained while also entertaining the client enough for them to enjoy it. I usually split my lessons in various sections, but as I'm constantly required to keep an eye on the students and their surroundings keeping track of time can be challenging. I would like to keep the different sections of my lessons saved with the corresponding timers I would be able to deliver the safest and best lesson I possibly could.
